"Not they, lad. We've truth on our side, and Heaven won't let the inno-cent be wrongfully punished."

"Heaven will have to work some-thing like a miracle, then, to cope with this business," answered Tom, despair-ionty.

"I hadn't thought about the holidays," answered Mary. "What with the strike, being ill, and one thing and another. I'm in no grand spirits for Mary had forgotten that it was White-

"I say It's a plot, a downright in famous plot to ruin me; and I have a right to have all particulars given to me."

"Don't make a scene here in the mill, or I'll have you put out," said Mr. Coole. "You're not, going to bully me into doing just what you want. "I want to see what you call the proofs," orded Tom, here breaking in to explain his attempt.
"That may or may not be true: I am not going to argue. Now you had better go away. I don't want to do you more harm than necessary. Your father worked for me for many years, and for his sake I wish to do nothing harsh. Therefore, you understand, I shall make no discovered times, and to be so, and if the wishest to strengthen the resolve by many properties to true footsteps of those who were introduced to begin their hollelay carry in the dny.
Saddenly a knock sounded on the door of the cottage, making the girl start. Then a hand tried the door and, during it open, some one came with a heavy step along the passage.

What is it?" asked Mary, going to meet the incomer, and speaking in a low voice so as not to wake the old old man. harsh. Therefore, you understand, I shall make no decision till Monday or Tuesday. This is Saturday. If by then you have left the place, probably no more will be heard of the matter; if you are still here, and persist in coming to the mill, or showing your face in the village, the search of the same of th in the village, then you can reason for yourself what my course will be. "I shall not run away, don't you fear. I tell you for the fiftleth time, the whole thing is a plant, and I have had no more to do with your money than the mill chimney has; and that man knows it." He pointed to Gorringe, his finger shaking with rage. "It is nothing but a cowardly attempt to disgrace me and drive me from the place. But I won't go, do you hear? place. But I won't go, do you hear? I won't go. Or if I do, it'll be after there's been something to go for." At this point the door of the office was shut, and Tom was left alone on the outside. After muttering for a minute he turned on his beel and the room where her looms were, and getting her hat and shawl went after him in order to try and console him. She did not overtake him before he reached his cottage, and when she went in he was sitting woe-begone and miserable, with his head resting on his arms, which were stretched out before him on the table. and called him by name. He raised his face, all haggard and worn and

"They've beaten me, Mary. I don't know how they've done it, but they've got the 'proofs of my having robbed them, and I swear to Heaven I'm as innocent as a youngster. They've turned me out of the mill, and ordered me to leave the village, or else they'll prose cute me. It makes me mad to think of

"I heard Mr. Coode, Tom," said the girl, "and am glad you told him you weren't to be driven away. The truth will come out in the end. What do you mean by having proof?"

"I don't know what they've done, or how they've done it, lass; but the money in the mill accounts is short by thirty or forty pounds. I mean that which has passed through my hands. There are the papers which show I had it, and there's nothing to show what I did with it. It's as clear as daylight to look at. It staggered me, myself; but it's all a lie from A to Z. I'm no thief. I'm no saint, maybe; but I haven't dropped to stealing. Though, for all the chance I've got of having the thing cleared up. I might as well be a thief. But I'll face it out." "Well said, Tom." exclaimed Mary.

"We'll face it together, lad. Your trouble shall be mine too, my dear; we'll meet it band in hand. If they drive you away, they shall drive me with you; but we'll fight against it as long and as hard as we can."

Tom was touched by her words and the loving confidence of her tone; and drew her to him and kissed her.

"You're s good lass, Mary; but this'll be a sore pinch for you-greater, may-be, than you see yet. They'll beat me to the end, as they've beaten me so far. There're too strong for me, lass,"

No. Mr Roylance, it's me, said Mary going into the inner room where he lay, "where is Tom?" "That's just what I don't know, my lass, I don't know whatever's come to the ind. He went out somewhere about eight or nine, I should think it was, and came rushing in half an hour ago all in, a burry-scurry.

HOW THE WEAR'S WAS FORMS.

The news of the murder spread through the mill village and alled all clarges of the people with consternawould have an opportunity of proving to him how true was her love. After she had had some tea, Mary took a book and went up to her bed-room, the window of which overlooked the road, and she sat there to wait and

Mr. Coode had not, for some years, was shift, and four was left alone on the outside. After muttering for a minute he turned on his beel and swing out of the mill, across the yard, and through the gates at a quick pace, his face wearing an angry and dejected look, which went to the girl's heart.

She called him by name, but he did not hear, and then she hurried back to the room where her looms were, and getting her hat and shawl went after while she waited, she thought, and getting her hat and shawl went after her to small and she sat there to wait and watch for Tom's coming.

Whan dusk grew into darkness and the air began to grow chilly Mary closed the window and went down to be much stairs, thinking it could got be much longer before Tom's arrival. Then it struck her that it might cheer him to have a bit of warm supper. Moreover, the late of the foil it but in former times he had on the sail but help to make the time pass.

But when the meal was ready, and the clock pointed to ten o'clock, there were still no signs of Tom.
Eleven o'clock struck, and the sharp, sulck strucks of the little dram clock, and the sharp, and the strucks of the little dram clock.

Eleven o'clock struck, and the sharp quick strokes of the little dram clock, as she counted them, made her begin to feel anxious.

Where could Tom be? She looked regretfully at the meal she had made ready for him in vain; and she sighed She went outside again; but this time it was as much to cool her hot brow as to look for Tom's coming.

At midfurf Tom's coming.

At midfurf Tom's coming.

At midfurf Tom's consing.

At midfurf Tom's consing.

At midfurf Tom's consing.

At midfurf the was more anxious than before. Tom could not possibly be with Mr. Coode until such an hour as this. But if not, where was he?

Could they have locked him up?

The thought harassed her so much that at last she felt she must find out for herself whether there was any ground for it. She resolved to go down to Tom's cottage and ascertain whether any tidings of him were to be obtained there.

The village was very still and dark as she harried through it. As she had rushed out at more and given the alarm sending the first persons the marked through it. As she had for the palicy while he range and service when the read to the middle of the room, he had found the body of Mr. Coole. The village was very still and dark as she hurried through it. As she passed the cottage where Savannah Morbyn lodged she saw a light in it and a sudden lappules prompted her to go and ask for Savannah and find out whether she had seen Tom.

She knowled lightly at the door a lighted candle above her head and pering out, asked who it was "It's me, Mary Ashworth, Mrs. O'Brien," said Mary "Is Savannah in?"

"Deed and she's not," answered the woman." She's away, and she'll not be come, and immediately began to be come?" She know question. The Usuali Good night."

The news was a little relief to Mary Wherever Tom might be it was certain.

"You say you found the office door open." he asked.

Good night."

The news was a little relief to Mary Wherever Tom might be it was certain the was not—but she chided berself for even harboring such a thought and left it unexpressed.

She hurried on to Tom's cottage: and found it all in darkness. At first and found it all in darkness. At first and tound it all in darkness. At first and the such that he was a strings weren't all right, and that nade me push the docropen wider," said the sun.
